PROGRAM NOTES

Mozart wrote his Sonata in B-flat, K. 358 in Salzburg in 1773. The sixteen-year-old musician chafed under the strictures of his court employer, composing instrumental and vocal music in the popular Italian style while neglecting his primary duty of producing sacred works. The outer movements of K. 358 indulge in the fast-paced comedy of opera buffa, while the middle Adagio strives for a more tender affect by suggesting a confessional aria.

Brahms’s Liebeslieder Waltzer (Love-Song Waltzes) exists in two forms—for piano, four-hands, with and without a vocal quartet. The poems on which each piece is based are brief lyrics on various aspects of romantic love by Georg Friedrich Daumer. Even without text, each waltz is suffused with a unique and fleeting fragrance of longing, flirtatiousness, jealousy, friendship.

American composer Jonathan Kolm’s Suite for Piano, Four-Hands consists of three pieces linked by common melodic material. “Night Scene” begins with a statement of the main theme and features the unsettling timbre of mallets playing directly on the piano strings. “Dream
State” combines imitative counterpoint with atmospheric clouds of figuration to describe thoughts passing from the conscious to the unconscious. “Pursuit” is a perpetual-motion finale that makes extensive use of the main theme.

John Adams’s short, high-energy showpiece American Berserk owes its title to the Phillip Roth novel American Pastoral. In Roth’s novel, an assimilated Jewish man in Newark, New Jersey, achieves the American dream—success in business, a happy marriage, a suburban lifestyle. His daughter falls under the influences of 1960’s radicalism, turning on her father as a representative of the morally bankrupt capitalist system, plunging him into “the fury, the violence, and the desperation of the counterpastoral - into the indigenous American berserk.” Adams’s piece alludes to bebop—New York jazz of the 40s and 50s—with its fast-tempo, syncopated, swinging rhythm. Rhythmic displacement and jagged juxtaposition of harmonies that might have fit in a Gershwin song suggest the irrational, dangerous undercurrents of American culture.

Frederic Rzewski’s music is infused with social and political conscience. Down by the Riverside, the third of his four North American Ballads, is a fantasy on a gospel tune with a pacifist theme. The melody first appears in a simple folk style, but is soon subjected to polytonal and contrapuntal development that alternates between violence and tenderness. The piece concludes with a richly decorated and comforting restatement of the tune. More than a paraphrase or potpourri of popular themes, Liszt’s Reminiscences of Don Juan is a Romantic interpretation of Mozart’s opera Don Giovanni. Liszt selects three sections for his piece: the graveyard scene, in which the statue of the murdered Commendatore accepts Giovanni’s invitation to dinner, the duet “La chi darem la mano,” in which the Don seduces Zerlina, and the so-called “Champagne Aria,” Giovanni’s mission statement. First comes the Commendatore’s admonition, “You’ll laugh your last ere daybreak.” The music for this section invokes the supernatural through minor tonality, chromaticism and orchestral effects like the tremolo. The tremendous vitality of the duet and aria sections strive to overcome the fatalism of the opening section and the foreknowledge of Giovanni’s downfall. The first section dissolves into the Don’s seductive “Come with me,” a motive featured in the duet “La ci darem la mano,” “Give me your hand.” Liszt varies this famous theme with virtuoso figurations and even a little fugato. The transition to the aria section shows Liszt’s deep knowledge of the libretto. “La ci darem la mano” is interrupted by the Commendatore’s semantically similar line, “Dammi la mano in pegno,” “Give me your hand in pledge.” This bargain seals Don Juan’s fate. When the Commendatore returns—left out by Liszt, but the climax of Mozart’s opera—he will punish the Don for his misdeeds. The last section of the fantasy—an aria that highlights Giovanni’s insatiable lust for life—is a massive crescendo of pianistic difficulty. Near the end of the piece, the Commendatore’s threat is repeated, but Don Juan’s Romantic spirit suffuses the final bars.
